PROJECT PROFILE:

FACILITY RENOVATION

A beer distributorship serving Chicago's south side and southern suburbs, wanted to renovate a 30 year old building. The facility, which was to undergo a complete renovation, needed to continue to operate while the work progressed. The key to this successful project was to conduct the work in phases, relocating the various departments as the work progressed. Raffin Construction worked with the owner on changes to bring the overall project cost within their budget.

The project included replacement of the exterior glass and the extension of the building's stone face both in height and length. The interior renovation work included the installation of new coolers, renovation of existing coolers, construction of the sales training area and offices, and the renovation of the general offices.
